Market Commentary

The month of May saw slowing global economic growth and international trade remaining weak. The US outlook has softened with PMIs falling; new orders down and investment slowing. However, there are some tentative signs that slowing economic conditions in Europe may have abated.

Equities have produced very strong returns in 2019, but these gains were tempered in May in response to ongoing trade concerns. Australian equities have been a standout performer, in part due to a further depreciation in the Australian dollar and a rise in the iron ore price. However, the rise in iron ore prices appears to be supply side driven (e.g. Brazil supply issues) rather than representing a strong increase in demand from China.

Trade wars are having a negative impact on markets and uncertainty is rising. With the initial rounds of US tariffs in place for some time, there is growing evidence that the costs of the tariffs have fallen mostly on US businesses and households, with no clear reduction in the prices charged by Chinese exporters. These findings suggest that the tariffs will put upward pressure on US inflation in the near term.

Domestically, the unemployment rate rose to 5.2% in April 2019. Full-time employment fell marginally while part-time employment increased. The underemployment rate — measuring those people who have a job but would like to work more hours as a percentage of the workforce — jumped 0.3 percentage points to 8.5% in seasonally adjusted terms.

These indicators suggest there continues to be a level of labour market slack in the Australian economy.

Relatedly, with inflation in Australia remaining muted, after the month-end the RBA cut the cash rate by 0.25% to a historically low level of 1.25%. The RBA rate cut was already priced into the markets.
